This week: "Did you know?"

Jason Fisher never intended to write a book. After losing his young Fairhope wife unexpectedly, he thought he'd self-publish a journal for his beautiful, non-verbal, special-needs daughter to someday know who her mother was. He thought he'd put it on the shelf and call it done. But he sent it out to four publishers and got four contracts in return. And now, The New York Times is calling...

After an epiphany moment that guided him to jump into the middle of the story by opening in discussion of the worst day, he said, "If I can't write about the worst day, I can't write it." Rather than block it out, he immersed himself in the crazy scenario of what happened that day, and now he encourages others:

1) Reach out to someone going thru a difficult time; don't ignore them. If you don't know what to say, it'll come. 2) Everyone goes through grief differently.

"There are times you can feel like you are the only one. Instead of questioning and thinking you're the only person who understands, look at what your life needs are and follow what is going to help you." 3) Get to know the special-needs population. Schools, individuals, groups, everyone can benefit from seeing the world from a unique perspective. 4) Go to www.chromosome18.org and familiarize yourself with the mission. 5) Watch for a future author event (hopefully!) at Page and Palette. 6) Buy the book and share it with a friend: "To Where You Are: Love, Loss, and Finding the Path Home" (2022, Warren Publishing).
